Meet the rugby league stars who have become trained bodyguards

Players are following in the footsteps of former Warrington centre Matty Blythe

By Gareth Walker, Rugby league correspondent

Jarrod Sammut will go from defending try lines to protecting clients after training to be a professional bodyguard.

"Rugby league players don't earn millions of pounds and can't retire to the golf course when they finish playing - they have to go to work and that transition can be tough. But these guys are used to putting their bodies on the line every week, and doing detailed planning and preparation work.

"All the players that have done the training so far have been great and they've now got a qualification in place that allows them to enter the executive bodyguard world. It could be politicians, celebrities or anybody that needs close protection, and these guys are now qualified to do that."

The players have qualified in advanced surveillance, close protection, TSCM (Technical Surveillance Countermeasures) and first aid at work, with further information available at www.vanquishacademy.com.
